Cleansing of the browser history

Reader: We shall now open our browser history together.

Our personal data which belongs to each of us individually, is our property. We can see it is real and it is private.

All: We open our browser history together.

Reader: We have faith that erasing our data will both stop websites from spying on us and our friends from seeing our embarrassing searches. We look forward to a future with less targeted advertising.

All: We have faith, and we enter the clear browser data or history dialogue box together.

Reader: Our devices are our own and corporations are our bitches. They made these laptops and phones for us, we are in control. There is no cancel button, we shall now press clear data or ok to continue together.

All: We see no cancel button. We confirm, clear data,

and continue.

Reader: Thank you. As your issue appears to be resolved, we're closing your ticket. Let me know if there is anything else I can help you with today.

Ablution of the deleted files

Reader: On the desktop we are presented with a holy icon:

the trash or recycle bin. We have faith in the circular economy and know that our waste files will be fully reused.

All: We open the trash or recycle bin by clicking the holy icon.

Reader 2: We see our old files before us; we know in our hearts that deleting them will both free up memory and give our device performance benefits. We trust our OS to run automatically scheduled defrags which we dont understand.

All: We enter the "empty trash" or "empty recycle bin" dialogue together.

Reader 2: We pray to the great Sophia, goddess of rebirth, destroyer of this material universe, abd ask her to return these unwanted and potentially incriminating files to nameless chaos. By Her Will our data will be obliterated and become unknowable.

All: We see no cancel button. We confirm, clear data,

and continue.

Reader 2: Thank you. As your issue appears to be resolved, we're closing your ticket. Let me know if there is anything else I can help you with today.
